Innovative displays featured automated waste segregation units using basic sensors and models of eco-friendly plastic recycling. Hydroponics setups (growing plants without soil) and organic vertical farming systems were demonstrated to show how urban spaces can be utilized efficiently.

The projects were critically evaluated by a panel of expert judges on scientific accuracy, real-world feasibility, cost-effectiveness, and alignment with sustainable goals.

The Ad-Mad Show, hosted in the packed college auditorium, brought a wave of energy, humor, and brilliant corporate strategy. Teams were tasked with conceptualizing, scripting, and acting out live advertisements for hypothetical sustainable products. Students created hilarious yet thought-provoking ad campaigns for products. Each team was given 3 to 5 minutes on stage. The performances were a master class in witty slogans, catchy jingles, and sharp acting. The teams were graded on their marketability strategy, humor, stage presence, team coordination, and how effectively they communicated the "sustainable development" core value without losing the audience's attention.

Both segments witnessed fierce competition. The exceptional concepts presented by the students made the evaluation process highly competitive for the judges.

The event concluded with an inspiring closing address by our Principal/Director, who lauded the students for their forward-thinking mindsets. The event successfully achieved its goal: it made the heavy concept of "Sustainable Development" practical, fun, and deeply educational. Winners were awarded eco-friendly certificates and trophies, and the day wrapped up with a formal vote of thanks to the faculty coordinators and student volunteers who managed the event smoothly.
